As you can see from the following example, I am using the AllDayEvents.com API to find the "all-time low" value for each month. To see how to find the maximum value for each month, see Using the MonthAverageRow and MonthsRangeParams. In this case, the AllDayEvents.com API returned the following date, time, and value: response : { "confirmationToken" : "", "endDate" : "19-Jan-19", "startDate" : "05-Oct-18", "startTime" : "06:00 am", "status" : "OK", "timeZone" : "Etc/GMT" } Here is the python code I have to retrieve the above value:

import json
import requests
alltimeLow = requests.get("") data = json.loads(alltimeLow.text)
for i in range(1, 1 + len(data["response"])):
    endDate = data["response"][i]["endDate"] startDate = data["response"][i]["startDate"] startTime = data["response"][i]["startTime"] alltimeLow = data["response"][i]["value"]
    print(startDate, startTime, alltimeLow)

 However, the result I am getting is the following: 2019-01-01 06:00 - 570 2019-10-01 06:00 - 1750 2019-10-01 06:00 - 1750

It's time to give up on the 3.5-liter EcoBoost V6's efficiency in the face of fuel economy mandates and a steady decline in market share. Here at Edmunds, we find these statements disconcerting. Not only are they (allegedly) false, they're a shame. The 3.5-liter EcoBoost V6 has been the bread-and-butter engine for Ford and General Motors for some time now, and it's had a great run. For its part, we haven't seen that barrel-chested number four cylinder that we always wanted more of. But its time is coming to a close. Not in sales, of course, but in sales efficiency. Internal combustion engines have been struggling with efficiency for some time now. Displacement is shrinking in motorcyclists and cars in order to reduce the output and fuel economy. Design advancements have made it difficult to add fuel economy and reduce emissions. And then there's fuel prices, which are inching higher. People have to get their cars and trucks home, and the internal combustion engine is simply no longer the least costly way to get from point A to point B. That means that, for some time to come, the 3da54e8ca3
