What's new:

: American League Power Rankings, Part IV It has been nearly a month since our last Power Rankings. Did you miss us? Sore? We've brought you plenty of hoops coverage leading up to Thursday's trade deadline (now less than 24 hours away). We've previewed the top contenders throughout the A.L., discussed and hand-waved about the divisions, and moved on to the point spreads and finals odds. Today we run the table to find out who's best of the bunch, and also decide which teams will make playoff run next season. Truth is, every team was worthy of this list, and we considered each and every one of them to be a serious contender. Each of the contenders had strengths, and weaknesses, and certainly took a small run here. But now we're confident that we've got it right. We've got a record, the standings, and more importantly, the best postseason team in the league, right there. Can we proclaim who's the best AL team? Read on for our final verdict. 8.

ARIZONA: Offense: Life without Steve Nash is a lonely one. The Suns' starting five, save Michael Beasley, have put up just 12.2 per game collectively this season. Phoenix's offense is like an out of sorts toddler -- it's not hungry, and it can't stop whining, but it's got a temper tantrum I'd argue is hard to top. 8.

ARIZONA: Defense: Defense has been the death knell for the Suns year after year, and they're no stranger to being known for their D. The Suns are currently tied for ninth in the league in defensive efficiency, and that's not horribly surprising, given they're currently 6.1 in points allowed per 100 possessions. Their 5.4 defensive win shares average the very bottom of the A.L. When you look deeper into Arizona's defensive numbers, though, it's much more promising. The team is among the top 10 in defensive win shares in the league in field goals allowed (T-10th), 3-point field goals allowed (T-14th), and defensive rebound rate (T-4th). Defensive rebounding is one of the keys to success in the A.L. -- something teams need to be prominent to win in this league. 7. MILWAUKEE: Total Offense: They don't deserve the luxury of a top 2 spot, but the Bucks are a top-10
