Rehabilitation of patients after total knee arthroplasty (TKA) includes a range of activities designed to restore function and improve gait mechanics. One factor that has received little attention is patellar resurfacing. The purpose of this study was to compare the internal patellofemoral (PF) and quadriceps (QF) angles during the gait cycle in patients with patellar resurfacing to controls. Two groups of patients were selected; one with no pre-operative deformity and a control group with a valgus deformity of  $\geq 5$  degrees. PF and QF angles were measured on clinical data-acquired radiographs during a patient-selected gait cycle (knee extended-30 degrees and 5 degrees of flexion). Twenty patients with no deformity were compared with ten patients with a valgus deformity. The mean (standard deviation, SD) patellar resurfacing group angle was 6.3 degrees (SD 8.5) at 0 degrees flexion and 2.1 degrees (SD 3.7) at 30 degrees flexion, whereas the control group angles were 13.7 degrees (SD 4.9) and 6.6 degrees (SD 5.3), respectively. A single predictor for the resurfacing group was found for both PF and QF angles at 0 degrees flexion; this was equal to the valgus angle of the contralateral knee. There was no difference between the resurfacing and control group angles at 0 degrees flexion. At 30 degrees flexion, there was no difference between the two groups. Patellar resurfacing significantly improves PF and QF angles in patients with no deformity. As it does not affect PF and QF at 30 degrees of flexion, surgeons should consider resurfacing at an earlier stage in rehabilitation, especially in the presence of a valgus deform

Like many if not all municipalities, the City of Pittsburgh has growing needs which cannot be met by current revenues. The City of Pittsburgh must raise more revenue to meet its water and sewer service needs. The City can either raise the revenue, or make cuts to the debt which is the current method of dealing with high levels of government debt. The City cannot borrow more money to pay for a new spillway for the Allegheny River, so the City of Pittsburgh must seek to reduce the debt. The problem is it is not possible to reduce the debt and still maintain the level of service that is currently being provided. One of the areas where the City of Pittsburgh can increase debt is the area of distribution. This area of the system serves users in areas that are not close to the city's water treatment plants, but are in fact serviced by those plants. 6d1f23a050
