It does present the same problems, no doubt. But most importantly, it changes the approach to learning. Most music students are at least somewhat familiar with the outline of the basic concepts, either in the form of grade school piano or maybe a music history class. If, instead of teaching the basics, we start with the basics, even at a very young age, then perhaps a revolution in the way people learn, think, and process music could occur. Much of the article actually states that we tend to learn passively now, which is a huge problem.

While it is true that we learn (or try to learn) in passive, coddled ways now, and that's also true of music students, there is reason to hope that we can change things. Students of any age are endlessly influenced by the media in one form or another. It goes without saying that music and music media are most influential, but the internet is increasingly the new mass media, and it can have a tremendous influence on people. Music is social, and whatever the issues are in a given place or time, what people do changes how they perceive issues. This means that trends in music are coming from both young and old people, the young becoming exposed to the music of others they couldn't know before, and the old changing in the ways they learn about music. For the young, the change is only going to get greater in the next decades, whether it be music media, new technologies, whatever. I don't have faith that the average college student is going to change their lives for the better, but I do believe that I could become a huge influence in their lives in ways not possible a decade ago. He was no match, nor was I, for the flightless bird of affection. I was able to land safely, though, and was glad to be on the other side of the ocean. -- Petrarch
