Now, given that I am hardly a gifted manufacturer on the PC side, I have a lot of problems with the new version and all of its features. After years of Photoshop crashing for no apparent reason more than half the time, it now spends a shocking amount of time crashing. In fact, even after only a few days of using this new version I have had at least one crash per release, and have had a troubling number of system freezes and needs to restart. Lightroom has never crashed for me, whether it was all the way back to version 2.2.4 in 2008, or the current version 5.3 which I am reviewing in comparison. Nor has Photoshop, to the best of my recollection. Thankfully, it seems like this issue is just a compatibility issue with my MacBook Pro and not limited to Windows. I installed virtual machines set up on my desktop PC running Windows, and Lightroom performed as expected in the new version of Photoshop. With this review in hand, I find myself sitting on the fence of what to do. The reason why I may be hesitant to upgrade may be that I feel I'm caught in a two-way street anyway, with Lightroom trying to up its own game with cloud services. Will I want all my files residing in a cloud repository? That's for years in the future to determine. Even for me, who just opens a file once every few years, the new cloud service would be a bit mind-boggling. I may not be the market segment that Adobe is aiming at. Finally, it's all about the price. At $1200, I don't see Photoshop as anything more than a professional tool with a plug for web designers. Anything else would just seem like an afterthought. A free with iCloud Photo Sharing would be a fairly significant deal-breaker. And that's a deal I'm not interested in making.
